Recollecting Landscapes

The rephotographer - at least in Recollecting Landscapes - is not a pioneer making unprecedented, original images. The artistic aspect lies in the application and interpretation of the formal limitations. By making a choice as to how meticulously the limitations are followed and by sometimes (slightly) bending these rules there is room for a personal approach: something that can clearly be seen in the difference between the Charlier and Kempenaers photographs. At the outset of the fourth round of photographs (2014) this resulted in a significant problem since there were essentially two (sometimes three) different documents of each place. This called for a decision to be made between the Massart-Charlier photograph or the Kempenaers photograph. I decided, however, to try and rephotograph both. In doing so, no information is lost, on the contrary, I create an abundance of information for scholars and the public to work with. By photographing both the document and 'plagiarizing' the authorial image, I try to reflect on the practice of rephotography as a documentary subgenre. Although, in the end we will choose one photograph to be published, I would still like to present both on a website or in a database. (excerpt from a conversation with Mark Klett)

I have included both approaches: the Massart/Charlier-rephotography (filenames ending in 'maschar') and the Kempenaers-rephotography (filenames ending in 'kemp') in separate folders. The images that were selected for the publication can be found in the folder 'selected images', the criteria for choosing a certain approach are subjective and primarily based on what I found to be the best photograph of a location. In addition I have added a spreadsheet in which the date of the photograph (based on Massart's timing), the geographic coordinates and the direction of the view are gathered.

I suggest that within the context of research all the images can be used. For any other (external) use, I suggest the 'selected images' are used.
